Dear Harold,

Just as I had adjusted to life without the usual routine of speaking or writing with Sylvia, a new blow came in the mail today in the form of the latest issue of The Third Decade.

I wrote there 25 questions for Buckley at Sylvia's request, with the express understanding that no one but the USCA would receive a copy. It now appears that the text copies to several people, including Larry Haapala, who supplied her to Lee. Now, a virtual outline of my early work on Buckley has entered the public domain. And I was not even escalated!

I am so sadly disappointed in Sylvia. I had completely put the whole business of her papers out of my mind, but this latest evidence of betrayal convinces me that I was a complete fool to place my trust in her.

I am setting up my own practice while at the same time looking for a position to help me keep going until enough business comes in to enable me to be independent (just a handful of matters will do the trick). I shall a telephone number and mail-drop set up on Park Avenue, and I have ordered stationery. If I get a job, I will let Simeon Glaser for a week before starting it.

Best,

Faye
